network basic input/output system

Abbreviated NetBIOS, pronounced “net-bye-os.” A session-layer network protocol, originally developed in 1984 by IBM and Sytek to manage data exchange and network access.

NetBIOS provides an API (application programming interface) with a consistent set of commands for requesting lower-level network services to transmit information from node to node, thus separating applications from the underlying network operating system. Many vendors provide either their own version of NetBIOS or an emulation of its communications services in their own products.

network computer

Abbreviated NC. An initiative from Apple, IBM, Netscape, Oracle, and Sun Microsystems describing a networked computer designed to give system administrators greater control and security than a traditional PC provides.

The network computer is based on a minimum configuration of a 25MHz Intel i960 with at least 32MB of memory, running a Java Virtual Machine, and downloads applications from the server and runs them locally. Hard disk, floppy disk, and CD-ROM drives and expansion slots are not required.

The initiative fizzled out, in part at least because conventional PCs can do the same job, but also due to Compaq (and other manufacturers) creating the sub-$1,000 PC.
