Education in the United States Leo J. Eiden, 1981 The Geographies of Social Movements Ulrich Oslender, 2016-03-10 In The Geographies of Social Movements Ulrich Oslender proposes a critical place perspective to examine the activism of black communities in the lowland rain forest of Colombia's Pacific Coast region Drawing on extensive ethnographic fieldwork in and around the town of Guapi Oslender examines how the work of local community councils which have organized around newly granted ethnic and land rights since the early 1990s is anchored to space and place Exploring how residents' social relationships are entangled with the region's rivers, streams, swamps, rain, and tides Oslender argues that this aquatic space is his conceptualization of the mutually constitutive relationships between people and their rain forest environment provides a local epistemology that has shaped the political process Oslender demonstrates that social mobilization among Colombia's Pacific Coast black communities is best understood as emerging out of their place-based identity and environmental imaginaries He argues that the critical place perspective proposed accounts more fully for the multiple, multiscalar, rooted and networked experiences within social movements
