This change closely mirrors and is consistent with the declining share of parts and components in the PRC's imports from high-income East and Southeast Asia. The PRC continues to run trade deficits with high-income East and Southeast Asia in 2008 and 2009, but the projected deficits for 2009 are lower than for 2008 (Table 2). The PRC also runs a trade deficit with other East and Southeast Asia but this is primarily due to trade in basic goods, especially in 2008 and 2009. The PRC runs a trade surplus in parts and components with other East and Southeast Asia and non-East and Southeast Asia, which supports our earlier argument that the PRC's role as a regional assembler pertains primarily to high-income East and Southeast Asia. The PRC experiences a trade surplus in final goods vis-à-vis high-income East and Southeast Asia. Once again, however, this is mainly due to its trade surplus with Hong Kong. If we exclude Hong Kong, the PRC runs a large trade deficit in final goods trade with high-income East and Southeast East Asia. The PRC's final goods trade with other East and Southeast Asia is more or less balanced, and the PRC runs a surplus in its final good trade with non-East and Southeast Asia.
