ABSTRACT

Literature is well-versed with the contribution of financial inclusion from the deposit and financing size and its role in economic growth. These contributions include a boost in economic transactions and efficient resource mobilization. Islamic financial system is different from conventional banking as it distributes the risk equitably and promotes fairness in dealings. It helps in the integration of business gains as a borrower of Islamic capital with the earnings of savers as depositors. This study has proposed two channels via which Islamic financial development may incur growth. First is bank financing penetration, and second is depositor financial inclusion. Based on the data of 41 full-fledged Islamic banks between 2012 and 2017, the results show that both increases in bank and depositor returns have a growth-promoting effect. This prompts the policymakers with new insights. Policymakers should increase Islamic banking penetration to different sectors and regulate for increased extraction of the depositor contribution from the banking financing activity.

1. Introduction

Economies enjoyed rapid growth with the introduction of currency as a common medium of exchange created ease in long-distance trading and storing value (Mishkin, 2007). This fiat currency allowed economies to specialize in production rather than focus on the production of necessities to avoid meet coincidence of wants (Kiyotaki & Wright, 1989; Ritter, 1995). Sollow (1956) illustrated that a certain level of investment is required to counter the depreciation and needs of capital. Such that without it, the current infrastructure will eventually fail to support the population needs. Here the
