

Development and Displacement: Women in Southeast Asia. Edited by GLEN CHANDLER, NORMA SULLIVAN, and JAN BRANSON. Monash Papers on Southeast Asia 18. Melbourne: Monash University, Centre of Southeast Asian Studies, 1988. iv, 136 pp. Aus. $14.00 (paper).

Researchers tend to emphasize the high status and economic autonomy of women in Southeast Asia, particularly when compared with South and East Asia. Women in Southeast Asia may fare better comparatively, but they still are subjected to patriarchal controls and inequality, a situation often glossed over by researchers. Perhaps precisely because of this ambiguity—considerable female autonomy, some patriarchal controls, and flexible kinship systems—relatively few studies have explored the contemporary position of women in Southeast Asia. This short book, based on a 1983 workshop in Melbourne, is generally critical of capitalist development, particularly its detrimental effects on women. Unfortunately, the book does not achieve its potential.

In one of the best contributions, Leslie O'Brien traces historical changes in the sexual division of labor in Malaya and Malaysia in her analysis of contemporary labor-force segmentation. In another important study Kathy Robinson analyzes the contradictory changes in gender relations among the Soroakans in Sulawesi, where Inco built a multinational mining project. Although women have gained some personal freedom, they depend increasingly on men, having lost their former prominent and equal role in agricultural production. Robinson is adept at underscoring the contradictions in this situation, but her Marxist analysis is often overdone and tiresome, with every act or movement somehow tied to capital or capitalism.

Rosalinda Pineda-Ofreneo sketches the far-reaching effects of the new international division of labor by focusing on subcontracting in the Philippines, an important topic rarely addressed. Sukanya Hantrakul describes women's position in Thailand, exploring the relationships among sexuality, prostitution, Buddhism, the state, and parental control over daughters. Jan Branson and Don Miller argue that Balinese women have been displaced from the market; although Branson and Miller are probably correct, their data are far too skimpy to be convincing.

Maila Stevens presents the unique and complex situation in Negeri Sembilan, Malaysia, where matrilineal practices (adat perpatih) were reconstituted under colonialism. Today women own all ancestral land and more than half the rubber land, challenging models in which women are solely viewed as exploited labor within the household. This chapter typifies some of the more general problems in the book—it is severely scarred from editing malpractice. Sections are hacked up and moved around arbitrarily, and subtitles are too generously slapped on, turning an interesting and important study into a choppy and discontinuous read.

The Marxist feminist approach taken by most authors in the book creates both its strengths and weaknesses. On the positive side, many authors approach the question of gender relations historically, not just with cross-sectional data. Contradictions in women's position are often emphasized, illustrating the complex and context-specific nature of capitalist growth. On the negative side, some authors engage in economic overdeterminism, which I believe is at fault for the extraordinary lack of words, voices, and quotations from the women who form the basis of this book. Robinson is the only author to integrate respondents into her chapter, and Stevens alone discusses women's responses to change in a way that does not render them simply passive victims of external forces.

The three coeditors (for six chapters) have badly mismanaged this book. Most authors attempt to provide historical, political, and socioeconomic background for the

The Sociology of Southeast Asia Victor T. King, 2008 One of the main problems faced by teachers and students who have a scholarly interest in Southeast Asia is the lack of general user friendly texts in the social sciences The absence of an introduction to the sociology of Southeast Asia is especially unfortunate This volume attempts to meet these needs This is then the first sole authored introductory sociology text on Southeast Asia that focuses on change and development in the region provides an overview of the important sociological and political economy writings and considers the key concepts and themes in the field since 1945 Some multiauthored works do exist but these either are outdated or focus on specialized topics Aimed primarily at undergraduates up to the final year it will also be a useful reference work for post graduates and researchers who lack such a general work
