Improving Governance and

Best Practice in Workplace Pensions Great Britain: Parliament: House of Commons: Work and Pensions

Committee, 2013-04-25 The introduction of auto enrolment makes rigorous pension scheme governance essential This Report calls on the Government to reassess the case for establishing one body with sole responsibility for regulating workplace pensions There are concerns over current gaps in regulation and the potential for further gaps to arise as a result of now having three regulators the Pensions Regulator and the new Financial Conduct Authority and Prudential Regulation Authority set up to replace the FSA The Report argues that a single regulator is necessary to ensure that all members of workplace pension schemes are adequately and consistently protected It also highlights that deferred member charges and member borne consultancy charges have the potential to cause serious consumer detriment It recommends that both are banned by the Government if significant progress is not made in the very near future by the industry towards ending them There is particular concern about member borne consultancy charges and those charges applied to deferred members people who stop contributing to their pension scheme The trend towards lower pension scheme charges is welcome However a good average is not sufficient and there is potential for consumer detriment in schemes that persist in retaining high charges The Government should also regularly review its policy on capping charges for auto enrolment schemes Consumers are also continuing to lose out when they buy annuities because pension providers are not doing enough to ensure people are aware that they can shop around for the best annuity rate rather than being obliged to buy an annuity from their pension provider
