

5. The Caribbean Plantation Economy and Dependency Theory

Rex McKenzie

Lecturer in Economics, Kingston University

By Maria Dyveke Styve

I meet Rex McKenzie in Sutton, a town on the outskirts of South London not too far from Kingston, where he lectures in Economics. We had met earlier in the year, and we had gone from discussing the lack of radical thinking in the economics discipline to the intertwined nature of racism and capitalist exploitation. We start off the interview with the question of how he got into dependency theory.

Gunder Frank is probably where I started and that had tremendous resonance, the obvious things were of course foreign direct investment, imperialism, the whole Latin American malaise. I came across a book by a guy called Beckford, George Beckford. The book was called Persistent Poverty.<sup>22</sup> Beckford was a Jamaican scholar at the University of the West Indies, and he, along with Kari Polanyi, Levitt and Lloyd Best were the chief architects of something called the “plantation economy.” You know, that really kicked me off. So I got involved in plantation economy studies. I always remember this quote about the plantation economy, which I am trying to apply to South Africa to this day. It says “the plantation economy is a total institution.” The term “total institution” itself was taken from Goffman, who did studies on mental asylums. It was a way in which a small group of people organised a very large group of people to basically do as they are told. And that was the aspect that I was interested in, because I was interested in what I observed in the Caribbean behaviour, and why this behaviour emulates the master. Why do we emulate the master in behaving in a particular way? So, apart from economic dependency, there was this whole thing about a cultural dependency that fascinates me. There is an untold story about Jamaica. And the untold story is, there is racism in Jamaica today, there is racism where lighter skin black people look down on darker skin
