Treating Resistant Depression Joseph Zohar, Robert H. Belmaker, 1987

The Role of Insomnia and Reward Processing Deficits in Risk for Depression Yihan Irina Li, 2021

Sleep problems are strongly implicated in not only the symptomatology of depression but also in its etiology and maintenance. Anhedonia, a hallmark of depression, is related to alterations in reward circuitry. Reward processing can be further parsed into distinct components comprising anticipatory motivational and consummatory phases. Increasingly, research suggests that sleep plays an important role in maintaining adaptive regulation of reward processing functioning. Despite the large bodies of research on both reward-related deficits in depression as well as the role of sleep disturbance in depression and reward processing, few attempts have been made to comprehensively examine the potential interplay between objectively measured sleep disturbance and these separate reward-related components. Examination of daily processes may be particularly critical in informing our understanding of the mechanisms underlying depression pathogenesis. The current dissertation study utilizes a multimethod intensive longitudinal design to examine both between-person and within-person associations between insomnia and reward processing in the development of depression. One hundred and twenty-five young adults (M age 20.22 years) completed a baseline laboratory visit to assess trait-level reward processing function, chronic insomnia severity, and depressive symptoms. Following the baseline visit, participants were prompted to complete daily surveys 7 times a day for 7 days according to a semi-randomized schedule to assess momentary anticipatory motivational and consummatory anhedonia and mood. Participants also completed wrist-worn actigraphy to measure sleep across the experience sampling period. Results indicate that insomnia severity was not significantly associated with trait reward processing deficits. Findings also did not support the role of sleep in predicting next-day reward processing functioning. Results indicate that the interaction between trait consummatory anhedonia and prior night sleep duration was marginally significant in predicting next-day depressed mood. Longer sleep duration was significantly associated with decreased depressed mood but only for individuals with low trait consummatory anhedonia. For those with greater existing deficit in consummatory reward processing, the relationship between sleep duration and depressed mood was not significant. Findings from the present study enhance understanding of real-life temporal processes between sleep and reward processing in the development of depression. Pages vi-vii
