William E. Taylor

The case of telecommunications is so much more complicated than that of the airlines. I am deterred to the point of muteness—well, not quite—by the challenge of sorting out what ought to happen next.¹

In 1970, when Fred's magisterial volumes of The Economics of Regulation first appeared, telecommunications in the United States was unrecognizably different from today. Voice telephony was supplied by pervasively regulated monopolists — largely AT&T and the Bell System for wireline local (80%) and long distance services (near 100%). Competitive entry for local and long distance voice services was forbidden, service characteristics and quality were prescribed and prices were set (more or less) by cost-plus, rate base, rate of return regulation, administered by the Federal Communications Commission for interstate (long distance) services and by state public utility commissions for local and intrastate long distance services. This regulation was justified by presumed natural monopoly characteristics of at least parts of the industry. In contrast to the airlines ("government cartelization, plain and simple").

[t]he regime of telecommunications regulation...has been much more clearly and directly aimed at the protection of putatively captive customers from putative natural monopolies.²

Forty years have passed, and the landscape has changed. Recently, Fred began an essay on network neutrality with the proposition that:
