The Use of Derivatives by Investment Managers and Implications for Portfolio Performance and Risk Kingsley Y. L. Fong, 2008. This study provides an empirical examination of derivative instruments used by institutional investors. Our analysis provides a unique insight into the role of derivative securities within portfolios and the potential benefits from their use. We contribute to the literature using a database that comprises the periodic portfolio holdings and daily trades of active equity managers. The consequence of derivative use is analyzed using a number of performance and risk measures. Overall, we find the use of derivatives has a negligible impact on fund returns. This finding is attributed to low levels of derivative exposure relative to total fund size. We also evaluate how derivatives are used by considering the trading strategies executed by investment managers. The option trading patterns of active institutional investors are shown to be consistent with the execution of momentum trading strategies. The study also documents that active investment managers prefer not to use options markets to engage in informed trading.

Their perspective is global, and they present detailed case studies from the U.S., Europe, Japan, and the U.K. All corporate, institutional, professional, and retail investors.
