Morphea: In Hot Pursuit of a Highly Complex, Challenging Disease

Morphea—or localized scleroderma—is a rare and potentially devastating autoimmune condition, with distinct subgroups, that causes inflammation and sclerosis of the skin and underlying soft tissue. It affects both children and adults, with an estimated incidence of 0.4–2.7 per 100,000 people. Periods of activity—inflammation mingled with fibrosis—ultimately result in permanent tissue loss and pigment change. When this activity remains unchecked, it can produce permanent life-altering cosmetic and functional sequelae that include hair loss, atrophy (cutaneous, soft tissue, and bone), joint contractures, and—in children—growth restriction of the affected body site. Crucial to limiting this damage is the early identification of activity and initiation of appropriate treatment, both of which morphea expert Heidi T. Jacobe, MD, MSCS, has found to be significantly inadequate. This lack was even more pervasive when she first began studying morphea in the later 2000s.

When Dr. Jacobe unexpectedly encountered her first morphea patients in the mid-aughts, she knew little about this disease. As she began to recognize its profound impact on patients' lives and how minimal and nebulous existing knowledge and treatment were, she realized that this was her path. Ever since, she has been dedicated to the research that enables the medical community to recognize and understand this disease and its subtypes, treat it appropriately, and open the way to developing more-effective therapies.

This article provides an overview of Dr. Jacobe's highly varied contributions and associated insights. They provide critical guidance to practitioners now in diagnosing, assessing, and treating patients with morphea. And they will ultimately enable significant advances in treating this high-impact disease.

Discovering Morphea

Dr. Jacobe's dedication and formidable progress in illuminating morphea are the fruit of serendipity amplified by luck. In medical school she had particularly enjoyed the intersection between the immune system and the skin. Rheumatologic conditions were among the diseases that she found particularly intriguing, but she did not have a delineated goal. Serendipity opened the door to morphea when Dr. Jacobe was hired at the University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center (UTSWMC). Her chair, Dr. Paul Bergstresser, offered her the responsibility for modernizing the department's phototherapy unit and turning it into one of the region's premier providers of phototherapy and he
