

Moral Theology: A Critical Analysis*

In this article I wish to set forth a critical analysis of the current state of the discipline of moral theology. The overall thrust of my reflections is that moral theology, commonly understood to have been in a process of renewal since the middle of the century, may be not that renewed at all. The article will suggest that much of the change in the discipline may have been of the “reform” kind rather than of the “radical” kind. In the course of the analysis, some proposals will be made as to the more radical changes that may be needed.

It will be helpful at the outset to think in terms of a foundational twofold relationship of moral theology, to the Church on the one hand, to the academy on the other; and to comment that “at times the dual relationship causes tension for moral theology and for moral theologians”.¹ For instance, there is the tension that is caused when the attention of the discipline is absorbed by the concerns of the official or institutional Church, to the neglect of concerns arising from the academic thrust of the discipline itself.

Here one notes that much writing in moral theology tends to be about problems concerning Catholic moral teaching — notably, sexual and medical ethics, conscience, authority and dissent. It is unfortunate that this preoccupation has deflected attention away from critical reflection on the discipline itself, or at least has narrowed down attention to partial aspects of the discipline. The reflections which follow seek to correct this, by concentrating on what moral theologians do, rather than on Catholic moral teaching. One recognises of course that in concentrating on the one, it is not possible entirely to separate the two.

A working definition

Let us begin with a working definition of moral theology. I understand theology along the lines of Barth’s advice, to carry a Bible in one hand and a newspaper in the other. In other words, theology is an activity that mediates between the religion and the culture. This is also the definition one finds in contextual theologians such as Albert Nolan. It is also the understanding in the writings of Bernard Lonergan, one of the foremost methodologists in recent theology.

Within the context of this understanding, I go on to define moral theology (though later, I shall have questions about how we differentiate subjects within theology in the first place). I understand moral theology
