5. Questions to Ask About:
 - o Fundamentals
 - o Methodology
 - o Application

1. Definition:

A critical bibliography (also called an annotated bibliography)

- is a set of individual entries, generally of a page or less. Each entry identifies, briefly summarizes, and critically evaluates a study, article, or book.
- has an overall introduction to state the scope of your coverage and formulate the question, problem, or concept your chosen material illuminates.
- has an overall conclusion to sum up your conclusions about your chosen material.

2. Purpose:

The purpose of a critical bibliography is to provide the reader with the following information about a set of studies, articles, or books:

- The full bibliographic information in proper APA reference style (unless another style is asked for)
- A summary of the contents. In the case of a primary research study, the reader wants to know:
 - o the purpose
 - o type of study
 - o methodology
 - o results
- critical evaluation of the strengths, weaknesses, usefulness, and implications of the material for a specified enquiry or field or course of study.

3. Characteristics:

An entry in a critical bibliography must be

- precise
- self-contained, and
- informative

A critical bibliography is primarily a test of your critical appraisal skills: can you analyze the central concepts and arguments of the material, as well as summarize its content,
