OVERVIEW AND SUMMARY

THE PROBLEM OF "URBAN" POLICY

Urban policy resists precise definition. Historically, it has been considered (among other things) a component of subnational regional policy, a euphemism for much of domestic social policy; an umbrella term describing policies designed to deal with places; and as programs specifically addressed to the physical, fiscal, and social afflictions of central cities. The National Urban Policy Act of 1970 suggests that urban policy should encompass almost every aspect of domestic policy.¹ Each of the last three administrations has defined urban policy differently, within the terms of that law. The Nixon administration argued that urban growth policy should be a part of overall national growth policy, but the Carter administration, responding to 1977 amendments² to the law, confined its attention to urban areas, with a focus on distressed central cities.

While this debate over definitions is intriguing, it tends to be somewhat circular. In short, there has been no consensus about the outcomes desired of urban policy. The policy history of the past several years suggests that it may be more useful to think of urban policy as a search for an overall positive net effect by public policy on the economic, social, and physical conditions of urban settlements.³ This approach seems justified by the fact that various broad national policies, properly addressed to nonurban, or certainly not exclusively urban, conditions can have an enormous effect on urban settlements, whether metropolitan or not.⁴ Labeling a policy as urban is not as important as understanding the consequences of a range of policies for urban conditions and attempting to reconcile those intended and unintended
