ABSTRACT

This study investigates the written discourse performance of grade 11 senior high school students focusing on the development of genre-based instructional materials. The research encompasses a detailed examination of demographic profiles, reading material preferences, and academic strands to provide a comprehensive understanding of their backgrounds. A quantitative approach was employed, collecting position papers from 258 students across various schools. Data analysis involved descriptive statistics and inferential tests to assess levels of written discourse performance and identify key factors influencing discourse competence. Findings reveal notable challenges in students' performance, particularly in organization and the use of transitional signals. A significant proportion of students demonstrated deficiencies in these areas, highlighting the need for targeted interventions in writing instruction. The study also underscores the impact of students' reading habits on their writing proficiency, emphasizing the beneficial role of diverse reading materials such as journals and literary works. Gender-based analysis indicates an equitable distribution of writing abilities between male and female students, suggesting inclusive instructional strategies effectively support learners. The study concludes by proposing genre-based instructional materials aligned with students' reading preferences and academic contexts. These materials aim to address identified deficiencies in written discourse performance and enhance overall language proficiency.
