Crisis Stabilization And Economic Reform Therapy By Consensus:

Crisis, Stabilization, and Economic Reform Michael Bruno, 1993 This book authoritatively considers the phenomenon of the severe economic crises of the 1970s and 1980s as exemplified by the combination of high inflation and negative growth in Israel and Latin America The author analyses the common characteristics of such processes and their possible cures with a detailed first hand account of Israeli stabilization policy and a comparative policy oriented analysis of Latin American reforms Professor Bruno also calls on his experience to give a preliminary evaluation of recent stabilizations and reform attempts in several East European economies The discussion of the theoretical underpinnings of shock treatments provides a good example for the blending of a number of disciplines lessons of economic history open economy monetary and macro theory game theoretic applications to the theory of economic policy design concepts such as dynamic inconsistency government reputation and credibility and the rationalization of incomes policy The Clarendon Lectures in Economics were established in 1987 They consist of coherent sets of three or four lectures given by distinguished economists which are accessible to advanced undergraduates and also of interest to academics Subjects vary from high theory and applications of theory to policy oriented topics Lecturers include Professors J M Grandmont David Kreps Kenneth Arrow Angus Deaton Robert Schiller and Oliver Hart

Végh Gramont, 1995 A simple model is developed to understand inflationary pressures and stabilization in nonmarket economies In light of the model the paper reviews the inflation and stabilization experiences of several transition economies in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union These experiences are then compared to those of high inflation market economies The paper concludes that despite significant differences in the economic structure and institutional framework the inflation and stabilization experiences in transition and market economies are similar in many respects In particular monetary accommodation and lack of fiscal discipline are critical in sustaining inflation and exchange rate based anchors seem more successful than money anchors in bringing down inflation On the other hand wage policies appear to be more critical in reigning inflation in transition economies than in market economies
