The School by Donald Barthelme

The education system in The United States, from my perspective, is very good and efficient. From teenagers starting high school to college graduates following a professional career. We see people all the time finishing their years of education ready to head into the professional field. After looking at this some of us would think that the education system in America is indeed great, but in reality, there is one side people tend to overlook, a deeper and more meaningful subject that we don't learn through the usual courses. The purpose of life and death. What is the reason of us human beings living in this world? Why value life when death is an inevitable episode in everyone's life? This is what the author Donald Barthelme, tries to illustrate to us through his short story The School.

When thinking of school, I feel that most people have this misunderstanding where teachers are portrayed as sole authoritarian figures with the purpose of transferring their knowledge into the students. It is in the name, the student is there to study the teacher is there to teach. But this idea has a big flaw. Teachers do not have all the answers, in fact, no human has all the answers. Barthelme shows this case throughout his reading with Edgar, the teacher, trying to find excuses or meaning to why all those animals, plants and humans died. In the first paragraph of the reading, for example, we experience the death of all the orange trees planted for a class project, Edgar then tries to find a logical explanation to why they died, saying that it could have been the soil or some "stuff from the nursery that wasn't the best" (Barthelme 1). We see this
