

Yehuda Amichai: A Modern Metaphysical Poet*

David Fishelov, The Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Jerusalem, Israel

A comparative study of Amichai, one of Israel's leading poets (and the most translated one), and the English metaphysical poets of the 17th century, notably Donne, may help us to appreciate and to better understand Amichai's modernistic sensibilities. In my essay I focus on five levels of the poetic text shared by Amichai and Donne: (1) the extensive use of striking similes (the "metaphysical conceit"); (2) the tendency to elaborate on the similarities between the two dissimilar concepts introduced by the simile (the internal "rhematics" of the simile); (3) the use of pseudo-logical and pseudo-causal formulations; (4) the creation of dramatic situations in which a specific speaker addresses a specific addressee (usually a woman) in a relatively specific type of communicative situation; and (5) the treatment of the tension between religious concepts and secular experience. These clear affinities between Amichai and the metaphysical poets should not, however, cloud the significant differences between them. Instead, these shared poetic characteristics ultimately highlight the modernist nature of Amichai's poetry – with its tendency for fragmentation, exploring man's internal world, and expressing an existential point of view.

Although Amichai's poetry raises some metaphysical questions on the relation between the spirit and the body and the individual and the world, the term "metaphysical" of the title does not refer to the branch of philosophy which treats first principles or the ultimate nature of reality and experience, but rather to the "metaphysical school" of the English poets of the 17th century, notably John Donne. In this essay I would like to suggest that a comparative study of Amichai, one of Israel's leading poets (and the most translated one), and the metaphysical poets may help us appreciate and to better understand certain poetic characteristics of Amichai's modernistic poetry.¹ Such a study may not only illuminate certain poetic sensibilities shared by Amichai and the metaphysical poets, but may also underscore the specific modernist nature of Amichai's poetry.

Donne's comparison of the two lovers' souls to the two legs of a compass hundred years ago. In his article on Abraham Cowley, Johnson accuses the metaphysical poets of being fascinated with intellectual mannerism as against the ability to evoke genuine emotions. The innovative nature of the metaphysical poets caused Johnson even to question their qualification for the title of poet. According to Johnson, the metaphysical poets were merely using the outer forms of poetry, but were not able to produce true poetry.² Zernach also questions Amichai's title of poet, and towards the end of his article he accuses Amichai of using certain artificial poetic forms that have nothing to do with true poetry. In other words, the critical remarks of both Johnson and Zernach do not only reject certain specific poetic features of the criticized poets, but go so far as to suggest that they are not entitled to a seat at Parnassus at all.

It is interesting to note that despite the striking similarities between Zernach's and Johnson's critical reactions, the former has not been, as far as I can judge, directly influenced by the latter. Furthermore, the aesthetic criteria by which Zernach so aggressively condemns Amichai's poetry are derived from a different tradition of literary criticism. Whereas Johnson is interested in defending a literary decorum from a neo-classical point of view, Zernach rejects Amichai's poems from a national standpoint. According to Zernach, Amichai's poems deviate from the great chain of Hebrew poetry and go astray by practicing hollow imitations of foreign literature. Still, despite these significant differences in critical presuppositions, both the metaphysical poets and Amichai triggered basically the same virulent attack, and the innovative nature of their conceits seems to be the major stimulus for that attack.

It is possible to draw a parallel not only between the critical attacks on Amichai and the metaphysical poets, but also between the terms in which their poetry has been defended. Their advocates described their bold imagery as a means used to convey genuine poetic insights rather than an end in itself, and in both cases, the innovative nature of their imagery is described as the appropriate poetic means for expressing the heterogeneous nature of modern human experience.³

If we disregard the heated evaluative questions involved in the critical debate, and focus on the more stable ground of descriptive matters, it is in his "A Valeriction: Forbidding Mourning" is perhaps the most famous example of the "metaphysical conceit":⁴

If they be two, they are two so,
As stiffly two compasses are two,
They scale the flint foot, make no show
To move, but stich, if th'other doe.

And though it is the center sit,
Yet when the other far doth come,
It leaves, and hithereth after it,
And grows erect, as that center homet.

Such will their be to mee, who must
Like th'other foot, obliquely runne;
Thy firmnes makes my circle just,
And makes me end, where I begune.⁵

The following lines from Amichai's "Up on the Tree Comes" reveals some striking similarities with Donne's metaphysical conceit:

Look, we are two numbers,
Standing together and being added

Or being subtracted, for at any rate the mark
Changes from time to time.

It was so difficult until we got
To stand together, and we also knew

Multiples of happiness, and fractions too,
As happens to numbers.

Also now, beneath us, the world is a fraction-less
Do not fear, behold how beyond

That line has blossomed for us
The common denominator.⁶

Amichai's playful conceits have triggered a harshly critical comment from Shlomo Zernach, a representative critic of the "old generation." Zernach claims that by comparing the two lovers to numbers, Amichai performs a mechanical manipulation of ideas that suffocates any genuine feeling and thus any true poetry.⁷

These critical comments seem an almost duplicate Hebrew version of Samuel Johnson's famous remarks on the metaphysical poets, some two imagery, although they are often overshadowed by the overall pejorative tone of the criticism.

(1) The tenor and the vehicle of the image are taken from two extremely different semantic fields. The juxtaposition of two words (or concepts) taken from two "most heterogeneous" (to use Johnson's formulation) semantic fields creates interesting tensions: in Donne's conceit, the lovers' souls are associated with spirituality and tenderness, whereas the compass evokes the connotations of accuracy, technology and practicality; and similar tensions are evident in connecting the "cold" and abstract domain of arithmetic to the "warm" emotional domain of the lovers' experiences in Amichai's conceit.⁸

(2) Neither poet is satisfied with merely offering the comparison of two dissimilar concepts. After introducing this comparison, both Donne and Amichai elaborate at some length on various aspects that seem to connect the two domains – despite their apparent incommensurability. Donne enumerates at least three aspects in which the lovers' souls and the "stiff compasses" are alike, and Amichai's elaboration on the comparison of numbers and lovers offers no less than five aspects in which the two realms can be connected.

When, at the beginning of "A Valeriction: Forbidding Mourning," Donne compares the departing of the two lovers to the departure of the soul from a dying man (notice the semantic tension between the two concepts), he again elaborates on the depicted scene:

As virtuous men pass mildly away,
And whisper to their souls, to go,
Whilst some of their sad friends do say,
The breath goes now, and some say, no:

So let us melt, and make no noise,
No tear-floods, nor sigh-tempests move,
T'were profanation of our joys
To tell the tale of our love.

And when Amichai introduces the shocking comparison of God's hand in the world and his mother's hand in the chicken's guts, at the beginning, of "God's Hand in the World," he too elaborates on some specific details of that war:
