

franchising body is the local education authority. . . . Each governing body is then given a funded franchise to "market its school to the consumer community". This idea of franchise is perhaps more of a metaphorical construct than a legal reality, but it is thought-provoking nonetheless. Similarly, Chris Braund's chapter on income-generation raises quite fundamental questions about the kind of business schools should be in through its underlying assumption that virtually anything that can be marketed should be. This raises the question of how far schools (in Peters and Waterman's terms) should 'stick to the knitting', but beyond this it raises fundamental questions about how far it is desirable to translate increasing numbers of non-pecuniary relationships, among professionals and between school and community, into essentially pecuniary ones.

A second major issue raised by the book concerns managerial roles and relationships in the new LMS world. Brian Fidler's brief introduction to the section on personnel management points out that personnel managers act as go-betweens, mediating between managers and employees. He then argues that "school managers will need to acquire additional skills of personnel management and to refine their staff management skills to encompass a greater degree of manpower (person-power) planning . . .". Yes indeed; but who are the employers, the managers and employees under LMS? The implication is clearly that senior staff of schools are the managers, and presumably the governors are the employers. Clayton points out, however, that the LMS part of the 1988 Act 'is a statutory enabling provision of extraordinary scope and a confusion of legal powers and duties', and goes on to suggest that headteachers should 'find common identity with their staffs and not distance themselves into a management role remote from their colleagues in schools'. The potential tension between hierarchical and collegial approaches to management which this may imply is addressed at only a superficial level in the book.

The key general issue here is, of course, one of values and purposes and the central role of management in expressing these and generating commitment to them. The LMS dimension of this is illustrated in a number of interesting ways in the book. For example, Patricia Leighton draws attention to the importance of tendering processes which ensure that successful tenders are compatible with the culture of the school. George Thomas emphasises the critical point that budgets must be curriculum-driven, and Chris Gittins says 'we have found that the appointment of a bursar and the designation of an assistant has . . . actually freed leadership time for senior staff, something we never identified as a prime target for ERA'. Points such as these draw the reader beyond the functional focus which the book's structure encourages into a deeper and more value-centred view of what LMS is all about. The book is a valuable one. Much of it informed me, some of it stimulated me to reflection, and a few parts infuriated me. Its variety is, on balance, a strength rather than a weakness and it will be a valuable addition to the school manager's bookshelf.

Directors of Education — facing reform

Tony Bush, Maurice Kogan and Tony Lenney (Jessica Kingsley, 1989), £9.95 paper, ISBN 1 85302 506 2

There's something irresistible about a book which describes an activity which has taken over one's every waking (and sometimes sleeping) moment for the best years of your life. So this was a pleasure to read; indeed it says it hopes to be of value to practitioners of the activity it describes. That it certainly is and more besides for although theoreticians will find no extensive thesis here on which to chop logic, they will find a thoroughly compiled treasury of evidence not merely of what directors of education thought they experienced in the 1980s but also what they imagine the future might hold. In that respect the book is ahead of its time. That's delphic, for what I want to imply is that it would have been fascinating if it had been brought out a year or two later. After all the Bill was not yet an Act when people responded to the questionnaire, when the detailed implications of Local Management of Schools, for example, disturbed the sleep of only a few of us. That however is to cavil and will perhaps provoke Maurice Kogan
