Disability And The Displaced Worker:

Disability and the Displaced Worker Edward H. Yelin, 1992 With the passage of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 ADA the employment of persons with disabilities has taken center stage in policy debates The passage of the ADA could not have come at a more propitious time the employment situation of persons with disabilities particularly older workers has been worsening dramatically for over two decades In the traditional view this worsening employment necessarily follows the aging of the population which puts more of us at risk for chronic disease and impairment Yelin does not agree with that view nor with the alternative view that disability compensation programs entice persons with minimal disabilities to leave the work force by providing them with a secure income In this controversial new book Yelin dispels both these views and argues that the welfare state is not to be blamed for the growth in work disability Rather Yelin maintains that the growing work disability problem is due to the decline of manufacturing employment which drove older workers with disabilities out of the labor force as part of a first fired phenomenon He links disability to changes in all forms of work that made secure full time employment with a wide range of benefits a thing of the past Yelin argues that work disability policy and industrial policy must be joined to create a heightened demand for older workers generally and older workers with disabilities in particular When employers create work environments flexible enough to accommodate people with disabilities they enjoy the benefits of an exceptionally skilled able work force and the economies of a smaller welfare system Paradoxically the products of flexible manufacturing have been very successful in the marketplace demonstrating that what is good for workers with disabilities is also good for all workers and for the economy as a whole

Are Workers with Disabilities More Likely to Be Displaced? Sophie Mitra, Douglas L. Kruse, 2017 The literature on employment and disability has been relatively silent regarding the job loss experience of persons with disabilities We document the gap in job displacement rates across disability status in the United States over the 2007 2013 period using data from the 2010 2012 and 2014 Displaced Worker Supplements of the Current Population Survey We find that men and women with disabilities are respectively 75 and 89% more likely to experience an involuntary job loss than men and women without disabilities in the United States over the 2007 2013 period with gaps in displacement rates of eight and seven percentage points for men and women respectively A significant gap is found in most occupation education subsamples Using a logit decomposition we find that differences in observable characteristics do not explain the gap in the job loss rate across disability status Longitudinal tests following workers over a one year period point to a causal effect of disability on the likelihood of displacement While the disability gap may be due to unobservable characteristics job mismatch and employer discrimination are also possible explanations highlighting the potential importance of employer and public policies in improving the job security of workers with disabilities

Worker Adaptation and Employer Accommodation Following the Onset of a Health Impairment Mary C. Daly,John Bound,1995 The responses of workers and their employers to the onset of work limiting health impairments were investigated using data from the new Health and Retirement Survey The results indicate that many workers who suffer from health limitations are directly accommodated by their employers and that those who do not receive direct accommodation frequently adapt to their limitations by altering their job demands or by changing jobs These findings point to the potential for adjustments on both sides of the market by employers in the form of job accommodation and by employees in the form of job change
