The Ultimate Classroom Helpers

Have you ever met a kid that wouldn't love having a class pet? No neither. If you've been thinking about getting a pet for your classroom, I have good news for you. Class pets aren't just fun for kids, they're good for them too!

First, class pets teach students responsibility. There is a lot of work involved in caring for another living being. Students can be given jobs and tasks such as feeding the class pet, giving it water, or cleaning its cage. This responsibility builds confidence because students understand what they are doing matters.

Along with responsibility, students can learn empathy from having a class pet. Caring for another living being creates a healthier, happier classroom. Learning to take care of an animal increases awareness of the needs and feelings of others. Dr. Harvey Markovitch, a pediatrician at The Archives of Disease in Childhood states, "Being around animals is extremely beneficial for children. They're good for morale and teach children about relationships and about the world. Caring for a living being - learning to care for a pet helps them to learn how to care for a person."

Class pets also make learning more fun. They make exciting topics for writing and research. They can even be used to teach about living organisms, and can be starting points for fun research projects. They can even be used for story problems in math! Fun lessons and activities like these pay attention to the student's interests. They can even make kids look forward to going to school.

Every classroom needs a class pet. Some kids don't have a lot of experience with animals outside of school and miss these opportunities to learn about responsibility and care. Bringing pets into the classroom provides these experiences and make learning more fun.
