

A practical strategy approach to use of reflective practice in critical care nursing

Joyce Hendricks, Deborah Mooney and Catherine Berry

INTRODUCTION

This paper is a follow-up to 'Critical care nursing: a new beginning' (Hendricks-Thomas, Cooley & Mooney 1993), which addressed issues relating to the movement of critical care nursing curriculum to the tertiary sector of education, a curriculum grounded in philosophy reflecting the empowerment of students and nursing as a whole. Within this context empowerment was viewed as an emancipatory process which allows nurses as individuals, and as part of a collective, to gain control over forces which have controlled and shaped the direction of the discipline. Australian Nurse Registration Authorities support the notion of empowering practice through the Australian Nursing Competency Index (ANCI) which categorises the significant domains of nursing. These domains, importantly, include the nurse's ability to frame problems and solve problems. That is, nurses are expected to be able to assess the health status of individuals and groups and to plan, implement and evaluate the care provided to meet identified client needs. This ability presupposes the complementary ability to act as a reflective practitioner. That is, nurses are expected to practice self-evaluation and recognise their limitations and to function within the boundaries of experience and education for the professional development of themselves and others. Reflection, as conceived in the Graduate Diploma of Critical Care at Griffith University, Gold Coast, is thought to be a challenging but worthwhile method of empowering and developing critical care nursing students.

French & Cross (1991) assert that one way to foster empowerment is through the development of personal knowledge which is arrived at through the process of reflection. Thus, it may be said that for empowerment to occur nurses must acquire habits which facilitate the development of reflective practice. Because it is through reflective practice that nurses are able to sustain the central tenets of regulation, respectful and collaborative practice, necessary for the fostering of attitudes and skills in graduates.

This paper includes discussion of a conceptual model for critical care education in which reflective practice is the focusing concept. The notion of reflection and its use in critical care nursing is then addressed, including strategies which foster reflective practices in education.

BACKGROUND

The intention to produce graduates who are reflective and competent clinicians requires that the nursing curriculum be process-oriented. The overriding concern is to provide the means by which students can synthesise their cognitive, practical and personal experiences as the basis of learning. Traditional relationships between students, teachers and clinicians are engaged to facilitate the development of new associations between theory, practice, personal experience and perception. Without this redefining, transmission of knowledge becomes a reproductive process, rather than a process which transmits the student's self-knowledge as an empowering way (Foster 1972). Moreover, Habermas (1991) proposes that self-knowledge is the form of knowledge most appropriate for developing rational abilities in humans. This self-knowledge is gained through reflection, and forms the foundation for decision-making based on available information and engagement in emancipatory processes (i.e. thinking about one's own thinking). Thus, the development of reflective nursing necessitates a focus on the meaning and development of each student's self-knowledge. This curriculum is designed so that the personal, qualitative and subjective experiences of students in all teaching and learning situations are valued equally with other forms of knowledge.

The methods which shape learning in this way include establishing qualitative relationships to allow dialogue between the competing realities experienced by students, teachers and clinicians, the integration of practical and theoretical learning in nursing and other sciences, and the use of reflective techniques as learning devices. All of these methods encourage the development of self-reflective inquiry, which can lead to the construction of self-knowledge by students.
