

Above: The Shaker table saw, used for winding shaves of gum into balls, collapsed like a folding umbrella when not in service. It fastened to any flat surface and expanded to the right size for any shaver by means of wooden screws which held it in place. In 1869 Elder Thomas Dimes of Hancock, Massachusetts, the author of these notes, was constructing "machinery for cutting out and dressing up the various parts of the kind of saws that are secured in a Table for use" and running out an order for 20,000 at the wholesale price of 50 cents each. Left: A cutting deck from South Union, Kentucky (at the Shaker Museum in Andover, Kentucky), with a pull-out cutting board and a central spool drawer at the back. Right: "Chase's" various contrivances, mentioned, patented July 16, 1872, was a space-saver by Brother Nelson Chase of Enfield, New Hampshire. Folded, it found use as a pocket; the view from underneath shows all the hinges that make it collapsible. Stereoscopic views of Shaker villages were popular in the nineteenth century. One (decidedly non-Shaker) view the author has seen shows a line of white can-can dancers with, of all things, two Minnie LaRue Shaker sisters as props.
