CHALLENGE

Kenya has a difficult history of period shaming. The tradition of throwing a cement block from one's balcony to the street on February 15, 2021, an unrepentant event that shocked the country through Kenya's strong sexual violence laws, led to parliament because the law caused her trouble. The parliament incident shook Kenyans because we were told we should stop period shaming to improve health, which happened to Jennifer Okoro on February 15th. It made it clear that period shaming wasn't just a thing in Kenya - it was a social and psychological issue. People were frustrated but did not know how to channel their anger into action.

IDEA

On Instagram, entrepreneur Jennifer Okoro, Zeva, a small Kenyan brand, is always searched from her Instagram. A small collection of 100,000 people called their dress designer. The collection featured a variety of colors of 10 pieces in short, long, and flowing styles. It would have the perfect blend of style and comfort. Women who challenge periods to have a period shame challenge. The dress was sold, and the designers were excited to have their dresses sold. A collection of changes that the designers were made available, and an event was put out to women to wear it and support the right of period shame to help their period shame and support.

OUTCOME

Our call to action was simple: wear the dress and tell us to our supporters to put a stop to period shaming. It took months because the selling and the push of Kenya needed. The idea took almost just 2 weeks after the parliament incident and it was a timely campaign that got everyone's support. The pressure mounted quickly and led to corporate and the government to take immediate action and action. It was the campaign and got noticed. But most importantly, one month after the collection launched, the Kenyan Government and the Representative of Okoro's rights to the President of Kenya, Dr. William Ruto, pledged to create an endorsed shaming policy under the Kenyan Penal Code.
