By Pike and Dyke: A Tale of the Rise of the Dutch Republic George Alfred Henty, 1978-01-01. Rotherhithe in the year of 1572 differed very widely from the Rotherhithe of today. It was then a scattered village inhabited chiefly by a seafaring population. It was here that the captains of many of the ships that sailed from the port of London had their abode. Snug cottages with trim gardens lay thickly along the banks of the river where their owners could sit and watch the vessels passing up and down or moored in the stream and discourse with each other over the hedges as to the way in which they were handled, the smartness of their equipage, whence they had come or where they were going. For the trade of London was comparatively small in those days and the skippers as they chatted together could form a shrewd guess from the size and appearance of each ship as to the country with which she traded or whether she was a coaster working the eastern or southern ports. Most of the vessels indeed would be recognized and the captains known and hats would be waved and welcomes or adieus shouted as the vessels passed. There was something that savoured of Holland in the appearance of Rotherhithe for it was with the Low Countries that the chief trade of England was carried on and the mariners who spent their lives in journeying to and fro between London and the ports of Zeeland, Friesland and Flanders who for the most part picked up the language of the country and sometimes even brought home wives from across the sea naturally learned something from their neighbours. Nowhere perhaps in and about London were the houses so clean and bright and the gardens so trimly and neatly kept as in the village of Rotherhithe and in all Rotherhithe not one was brighter and more comfortable than the abode of Captain William Martin. It was low and solid in appearance, the wooden framework was unusually massive and there was much quaint carving on the beams The furniture was heavy and solid and polished with beeswax until it shone The fireplaces were lined with Dutch tiles the flooring was of oak polished as brightly as the furniture The appointments from roof to floor were Dutch and no wonder that this was so for every inch of wood in its framework and beams floor and furniture and had been brought across from Friesland by William Martin in his ship the Good Venture It had been the dowry he received with his pretty young wife Sophie Plomaert Sophie was the daughter of a well to do worker in wood near Amsterdam She was his only daughter and although he had nothing to say against the English sailor who had won her heart and who was chief owner of the ship he commanded he grieved much that she should leave her native land and he and her three brothers determined that she should always bear her former home in her recollection They therefore prepared as her wedding gift a facsimile of the home in which she had been born and bred The furniture and framework were similar in every particular and it needed only the insertion of the brickwork and plaster when it arrived Two of her brothers made the voyage in the Good Venture and themselves put the framework beams and flooring together and saw to the completion of the house on the strip of ground that William Martin had purchased on the bank of the river

Henty,2020-08-22 In all the pages of history there is no record of a struggle so unequal so obstinately maintained and so long contested as that by which the men of Holland and Zeeland won their right to worship God in their own way and also although this was but a secondary consideration with them shook off the yoke of Spain and achieved their independence The incidents of the contest were of a singularly dramatic character Upon one side was the greatest power of the time set in motion by a ruthless bigot who was determined either to force his religion upon the people of the Netherlands or to utterly exterminate them Upon the other were a scanty people fishermen sailors and agriculturalists broken up into communities with but little bond of sympathy and no communication standing only on the defensive and relying solely upon the justice of their cause their own stout hearts their noble prince and their one ally the ocean Cruelty persecution and massacre had converted this race of peace loving workers into heroes capable of the most sublime self sacrifices Women and children were imbued with a spirit equal to that of the men fought as stoutly on the walls and died as uncomplainingly from famine in the beleaguered towns The struggle was such a long one that I have found it impossible to recount all the leading events in the space of a single volume and moreover before the close my hero who began as a lad would have grown into middle age and it is an established canon in books for boys that the hero must himself be young I have therefore terminated the story at the murder of William of Orange and hope in another volume to continue the history and to recount the progress of the war when England after years of hesitation threw herself into the fray and joined Holland in its struggle against the power that overshadowed all Europe alike by its ambition and its bigotry There has been no need to consult many authorities Motley in his great work has exhausted the subject and for all the historical facts I have relied solely upon him By Pike and Dyke
