GISSING, 2018 Charles Dickens G. K. Chesterton, 2019-05-02 This classic volume is the first part of a definitive biography of the great English writer Charles Dickens by another fine English author his friend and colleague G K Chesterton and contains the following excerpt In everyday talk or in any of our journals we may find the loose but important phrase Why have we no great men to day Why have we no great men like Thackeray or Carlyle or Dickens Do not let us dismiss this expression because it appears loose or arbitrary Great does mean something and the test of its actuality is to be found by noting how instinctively and decisively we do apply it to some men and not to others above all how instinctively and decisively we do apply it to four or five men in the Victorian era four or five men of whom Dickens was not the least The term is found to fit a definite thing Whatever the word great means Dickens was what it means Even the fastidious and unhappy who cannot read his books without a continuous critical exasperation would use the word of him without stopping to think They feel that Dickens is a great writer even if he is not a good writer He is treated as a classic that is as a king who may now be deserted but who cannot now be dethroned The atmosphere of this word clings to him and the curious thing is that we cannot get it to cling to any of the men of our own generation Great is the first adjective which the most supercilious modern critic would apply to Dickens And great is the last adjective that the most supercilious modern critic would apply to himself We dare not claim to be great men even when we claim to be superior to them Charles Dickens; A critical study G.
