Using the Directory of Open Access Journals to Expand Publishing Opportunities and Stay Competitive

Armando Duarte
Kwansei Gakuin University

This article is an introduction to the Directory of Open Access Journals (DOAJ), which is a free search engine of indexed academic journals from across the globe covering many academic disciplines and dozens of languages. With the ever-present need for university teachers to publish their academic research to gain stable employment and engage in professional development, the directory can be an invaluable resource for both novice and veteran researchers alike in selecting a journal in which to submit a manuscript. This paper reviews relevant literature to establish that publishing original research is necessary for university teachers. It then offers an overview of how the DOAJ can be effectively utilized by researchers to find reputable, academically rigorous journals in which to publish their work more widely at no cost. The ways in which demographic changes in Japan have resulted in increased competition for a static number of teaching positions at the university level are also outlined.

Publish or Perish

Previous studies in the field of Japanese labor trends indicate that publishing research is one of the keys to stable university employment (e.g., McCrostie, 2010). An examination of the job postings on the Japan Research Career Information Network website (<https://https://www.jrecin.jst.go.jp/seek/SeekTop>) reveals the necessity of having a certain number of publications on one's résumé. The phrase "publish or perish" is often heard at conferences and generally anywhere that university teachers may gather. Although the sentiment is still expressed today, the phrase itself is close to a century old (Case, 1928). Furthermore, the trend shows no signs of reversing, and publication requirements will only
