

Work Disability in Systemic Lupus Erythematosus

Objective. To determine the prevalence, accrual over time, and risk factors of work disability in patients with systemic lupus erythematosus (SLE).

Methods. We studied 432 patients from an inception cohort. Work disability was measured from a single self-report question. Data were prospectively collected and included sociodemographic information, clinical lupus features including activity (Systemic Lupus Erythematosus Disease Activity Index 2000 update [SLEDAI-2K]), damage (Systemic Lupus International Collaborating Clinics/American College of Rheumatology Damage Index), and organ involvement, as well as health status (Short Form 36 [SF-36]), comorbidity, and medication use. Student's t-test and Wilcoxon's rank-sum test were used to compare continuous variables and chi-square tests were used for dichotomous variables. Descriptive survival curves of time to work disability were presented. Bivariate and multivariate logistic regressions were used to describe the relationships between clinically relevant factors and work disability.

Results. Of 432 patients, 88% were women and 73% were white. Within the first year of diagnosis, 47% of patients were employed, 7% had a disability, and 7% were on sick leave. Overall, work disability was found in 98 (23%) patients. Risk factors for work disability found in the multivariate regression analysis were younger age at diagnosis, less education, fibromyalgia, hypertension, higher first-visit SLEDAI-2K score, and lower first-visit SF-36 score.

Conclusion. Work disability is frequent in patients with SLE, with a cumulative prevalence of 23%. Work disability was associated with a complex array of health factors, including comorbidity, physical and mental health limitations, and clinical features of lupus, that warrant increased attention in future research.

INTRODUCTION

Systemic lupus erythematosus (SLE) is a systemic disease that predominantly affects young women, developing most often between the ages of 20 and 40 years and quite often prior to entry into the work force. There are few studies addressing the loss of employment (i.e., work disability) in patients with SLE. An early study of lupus and work disability conducted by Stein et al on 120 patients found that 85% of individuals were initially working. After a mean disease duration of 5.5 years, only 63% were still employed. Of the 38 (37%) patients who left the work force, 16 reported that their disease was the contributing factor (1). The few existing studies of employment in patients with lupus demonstrate that this disease affects work, including loss of employment, reduced working hours, and reduced performance or productivity (1–10). Prevalence estimates of those experiencing work loss within 5 years of diagnosis range from 15% to 40% (2,6,10). At 10 and 15 years the prevalence was 36% and 51%, respectively (10).

In a study of 159 lupus patients, Partridge and colleagues found that at 3.4 years of diagnosis, 68% of patients had made some changes to their work status, including 40% who stopped working completely, 53% who changed duties within their job, 49% who worked fewer hours per week, and 8% who quit one or more jobs (8).

Yelin et al surveyed a large number ( $n = 962$ ) of lupus patients with a second interview 1 year later. From the time of diagnosis to the time of the first interview (12 years), they found a 20% drop in those employed (10). At the same time, some patients were able to return to work.
