

Navigating the Current Realities of Humanitarian Disarmament Campaigns

In the field of humanitarian disarmament, the space for civil society action is shrinking. Organizations designed to harness international law and policy instruments for the protection of civilians are struggling for survival. They face reduced access to funding, growing distrust in multilateralism, and polarization between states. We are moving towards a new and more complex period in international relations, where previous roadmaps to humanitarian disarmament may no longer represent viable approaches. In a series of five policy briefs based on interviews and discussions with practitioners, we examine the challenges and opportunities facing the humanitarian disarmament community.

This second brief examines how civil society can navigate the current landscape of humanitarian disarmament campaigning.

Brief Points

- Tactics and strategies used by humanitarian actors need to be changed to suit the new environment.
- Internal dynamics of coalitions and campaigns must also evolve. The introduction of digital tools offers new networking possibilities and campaign efficiencies, but also reinforces some barriers to inclusion.
- Balancing technical expertise and prioritizing meaningful inclusion, collaboration, and connection with affected communities is essential for progress.
- A crucial aspect of future success is to reconnect with local and affected communities and ensure participation of civil society actors from the Global South.
