Getting to Know You Claudia M. Gold, Utilizing narrative storytelling, this user-friendly guide describes the principles of early relational health with direct application to day-to-day work with infants and parents. Practitioners on the front lines with young children and families often feel great pressure to know what to do in a broad variety of challenging situations. Drawing on both developmental science and extensive clinical experience, Dr. Gold provides evidence that the exact opposite a stance of not knowing helps us find our way into another person's experience, offering the greatest opportunity for connection, growth and healing. Gold presents a model of listening in with an intentional suspension of expectations and a willingness to be surprised. The paradigm of listening in functions as a kind of superpower to enhance teacher-student, professional-parent and parent-infant relationships. This resource will be important reading for a broad variety of practitioners including early childhood educators, home visitors, pediatricians, doulas and mental health clinicians, as well as policymakers, parents and other caregivers of young children. Book Features: Summarizes the key advances in our understanding of brain science, child development and infant-parent
