Ordinary plates and soup plates gradually increased in size during the eighteenth century from approximately eight-and-one-half inches to nine-and-one-half inches. They were generally circular until about 1745, when an octagonal shape was introduced by cutting the circular plate to leave angular edges (cat. no. 15). By about 1760 the octagonal plate often had indented corners and a molded rim (cat. no. 89). Plates of a slightly later period with gadroon edges reflect contemporary silver prototypes (cat. no. 24). By the end of the century, the rim of a plate generally turned up. Large circular chargers or platters (cat. no. 10) were common until about 1755; after about 1770, oval platters (cat. no. 62) became fashionable. Whatever the shape of an individual plate, it would have been consistent with that of the entire service, just as teapots, creamers, and tea caddies from the same tea service would all have been similar in shape. Likewise, different services with pieces of similar shape were probably contemporaneous.

In order to appreciate the extensiveness of Chinese export services, it is helpful to refer to the records of the period, such as the notebook of an American trader from Rhode Island who was in Guangzhou in 1797.²⁴ We find, for example, that a breakfast service consisted of a teapot, milk jug (or creamer), sugar dish and stand, slop bowl, plate, and twelve cups and saucers. Additional pieces might have included a coffeepot, cake plate, butter boat, and stand.

Fig. 7
Coffee can and saucer (cat. no. 59)

An ordinary tea or coffee service differed from a breakfast set only in the addition of a tea caddy and usually contained forty-nine pieces. In a double tea set, there were approximately 101 pieces, including twelve cups with handles and twelve teabowls without, to be used at different times with the twelve saucers provided (fig. 8).

More extensive than tea or coffee services were dinner services, averaging 171 pieces. "The standard service was composed of plates and platters of a great variety of sizes, ranging from 6 to 18 inches, some specified as 'flat' and some 'deep'; soup, entree, salad, or dessert plates; vegetable, pudding, and pie dishes; salad bowls; soup and pickle tureens; sauce and butter boats; fruit dishes or baskets, all with stands; and salts."²⁵ Although punch bowls were not actually part of a dinner service, they were probably used before or after the evening meal and were ordered in large numbers, often as presentation pieces (cat. nos. 4 and 90).²⁶
