Definition of FLS	Learning design: integration of a broadly accepted user design principle that is capable of integrating formalized elements – user design, knowledge activity is directed to improving the process by which the learning design is developed after first creating experience	FLS – the idea of a user-centred learning approach using formal software tools Formal software – software that connects people and provides collaboration and communication Self-directed learning: individual user initiated with or without the help of others in designing their learning process. Encouraging learning goals, identifying formal and informal resources for learning, choosing and implementing appropriate learning strategies and evaluating learning outcomes	Learning involves a way to create new user experiences by connecting existing tools and services from several sources Methods to aggregation: assemble sets of sets from different sources after single interface Learning by integration – complex operations that require different application programming interfaces (APIs) combine data from different sources	FLS facilitates learner choice and control, allowing the selection and combination of selected user-based learning opportunities from many sources FLS as extension of portfolio: providing learner centered environment in which learners can select, adapt, extend and join new work based on their goals FLS provides a set of tools which allows users to select and combine content to be managed effectively and provide a single point of integration with shared content system
Background to portfolio	Accept that FLS represents learning design. This creates the possibility that there is also the alternative for continuity of a new design which represents the use of a refinement of the design but an entirely new design which would offer a very different set of possibilities, tools, affecting the needs of different learners	Formal software provides the flexibility that is needed continuously to inform and coordinate learning strategies, where people and different prior knowledge, learning resources and learning activities from collaborative user or from others – pedagogical context and expertise about learning processes	FLS – self-defined collection of services, tools and devices that use learners from Personal Knowledge Networks (PKNs), encompassing both knowledge (content) and social knowledge (information)	Learning can be managed through a set of self-directed learning tools such as single portfolios, feed aggregation
Rationale for FLS	Focus on combining connections between user and services. FLS is concerned with creating value (out of content) to be coordinated to support the goals of the user – computer mediated approach to learning, multiple, integrates the variety, integrated experiences in a range of environments including education, work and leisure Dynamic adaptation – user able to construct and customise resources, integrate resources, manage content and social data to suit their needs Individualised content – user is engaged information either content as they use it or any	Flexibly – learners have problems based formal goals Range of use – customised by the user Control and responsibility of resources – content belongs to the user Copyright and license – content and its evaluation has to be made from learners Social presence – support of communication and active culture Capacity of content &amp; innovation – how experiences become reality and how learners create that complement to learning setting	Optimal FLS – no learners create their own learning material but manage personally with content generated by learning social presence and other learners (social) for them	FLS – cooperation technology – solution to organizational problems: managing students, providing tools and learning content FLS – learners allow single set of tools, customised to their needs and preferences create a single learning environment Real services – allowing different software tools to interact with each other in exchange data and information
