Abstract: This research looks into what are Extrinsic, Intrinsic and Altruistic motives and their importance when students are choosing their career. The study involved 324 teacher trainees in their first year of bachelor studies. The types of motivation when choosing teaching career were studied by SMVUP2-S (Teaching Career Choice Scale). The model of motivation types was supplemented by subscales: Influence by other, Career growth and Alternative choice. Objective of the study was to show the relationship between these variables. Results from the research showed that influence by other and alternative choice of teaching career were in a negative relation with interest and skills/experience that this career requires and students should have.

Keywords: career choice, teaching profession, motivation, influence.

1. Introduction

Understanding and establishing the types of motivation when choosing a career are important, especially when recruiting students for teaching studies or work [1]. It is probable that the types of motivation lead them to choose teaching as a career which will subsequently affect their professional engagement and manners they will use when teaching their students [1]. The decision to choose teaching as a career is multi-factorally conditioned, as it is empirically shown in many studies [2], [3], [4] that the most important motives of a teaching career choice are interest and competences.

The aim of this study is to find out to what extent extrinsic (benefits, social status, lack of interest, forced choice) and altruistic motives (pro-sociality, work with children and youth) correlate with intrinsic motives of teaching (interest, competence, career growth).

2. Theoretical background

We registered three types of motivation within pedagogical literature: intrinsic, extrinsic and altruistic. The motivation model of choosing teaching as a career presumes existence of various social factors in personality that is subsequently a decisive factor in career choice [5]. This construct shows different psychological mechanisms that are involved when choosing teaching as a career. All parts of the model affect an individual's decision [5].

Intrinsic motivation impulse comes from the inner personality structures. Therefore, it is more durable and effective than other types of motivation [6]. Intrinsic motives are the most frequent when choosing teaching as a career. They are considered the most important because they are directly related to the content of career [1], and they are predominately a good professional engagement in this field [7]. Therefore, intrinsic motives represent "the key to success" in teaching career [5]. Intrinsic personality motives include motives of competence, enthusiasm and interest [3], [8].

Altruistic motivation plays an important role when choosing teaching as a career. Altruistic motive may be understood as the desire to improve well-being of others [6]. It is connected with the concept of pro-sociality and it covers doing things intentionally to help the another person or group of people [5]. Altruistic motives are closely related to intrinsic motives because they correspond with the career content [9], [10], [11]. Altruistic motives of career
