

Dogs

Domestic dogs are descendants of wild grey wolves and can be found worldwide. Dogs come in an enormous variety of sizes and shapes as humans have been selectively breeding them for many generations.

Relationship with Humans

There is a long history of humans and dogs working together. Different dog breeds and individuals may have their own characteristics but generally dogs are quite intelligent. Many breeds seem to want to please humans they have a relationship with and they may also respond to food rewards. This makes them capable of learning commands. Many owners feel their dogs show them love, care and protection and some breeds were designed purely as companions.

Nowadays, dogs are often kept as pets but some dogs have a specific role or job to perform. These include working as guide dogs, search and rescue or therapy dogs, helping police or herding sheep on a farm. Some dogs even go to schools. They might 'bark' to children, read or alert a child with a medical condition if they need some help.

Selective Breeding

Selective breeding means using dogs with particular traits to make puppies. Over several generations, the traits are exaggerated. The appearance and behaviour of different dog breeds often match their intended purpose.

Border collies are intelligent and fast so they can be successfully trained to herd sheep.

Mastiffs are fast, strong and have two layers of fur which makes them suited to pulling sleds over snow.

Retrievers can hold things gently in their mouths as they were bred to bring back (retrieve) animals that had been hunted by people.

Fascinating Fact

Mother dogs are pregnant for about 63 days depending on the breed and average litters have between 3 and 9 puppies.
