Biodegradable William McGucken, 1991 Synthetic detergents rapidly replaced soap for most domestic cleaning purposes after World War II Concurrently great billows of foam began passing undegraded through sewage treatment plants into receiving waters which were often sources for domestic water supplies The detergent industry quickly learned that many surface active agents the active ingredients of synthetic detergents and the producers of foam were not readily biodegradable The most popular surface active agent was alkyl benzene sulfonate ABS Industrialized societies had developed satisfactory sewage processes to treat domestic wastes but even the most advanced treatment facilities proved incapable of degrading ABS Biodegradable examines the development of synthetic detergents and the unanticipated pollution of surface waters and groundwaters by this new technology as well as the social political and industrial responses that resulted in correction of the problem Public and governmental pressure in the United States the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany led to the international detergent industry s finding a biodegradable substitute for ABS namely linear alkyl sulfonate LAS Its use from the mid 1960s solved the foaming pollution problem The three countries responded to the problem very differently West Germany almost immediately legislated that only those detergents that were more than eighty percent biodegradable could be sold The U S government allowed the detergent industry to seek a solution while the Department of Health Education and Welfare monitored the industry s progress In the U K the government created committees and required industry to cooperate with them to find a solution Biodegradable not only examines problems resulting from a new technology but also compares and contrasts different societies methods of dealing with these problems
