INTRODUCTION

The study of development has long remained “one of the last bastions of modernism in the social sciences” (Rapley, 2007: 185) and many of the practices of development agencies, the World Bank, and others are still conducted within the theoretical framework set up after the end of the Second World War. Yet empirical evidence of persisting global inequality, and skepticism about the idea of modernity as growth – as it is, for example, represented in the world community’s Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) – in light of environmental degradation and serious post-colonial criticism, have put these visions into question both in theory and in practice. In the following, our first aim is to show the strong diversity of development theorizing and to understand the traditions that have developed.

International Relations (IR) as a discipline did not take sufficient account of development for a long time and had little substantive to say about states at the political as well as economic peripheries of the international system and even less about poverty as well as inequality within them (Neuman, 1998; Jones, 2005: 993). This trend reflected the tendency that “development has been consigned to the realm of low politics, except when the international order, as it has been constructed, is threatened” (Dickson, 1998: 367). IR has at times even denounced alternative approaches dealing with new issues, such as poverty, race or the environment, as non-IR (Smith, 2007: 6). Such issues were taken up in other departments, such as development studies, area studies, or comparative politics, where they tended to be compartmentalized in particular issue areas. Our second aim is to show that development practice and development thinking have, however, always been part of international politics, even though IR did not account for it. It is only recently that IR’s own diversity has reflected more and more the various critical, postcolonial, and poststructuralist tendencies of development. The discipline has changed over the last 15 years and has become less state-centric. Former ‘low politics’ issues have become more central in the study of international and transnational relations.

One of the reasons for this change is the rise of the BRICs economies (Brazil, Russia, India and China) that is shifting geopolitical realities and the practice of development. In particular, after the financial crisis of 2008/2009 the original core countries of the West are perceived to be in decline. Indications for the rise of the emerging economies are (i) the end of the G-7/G-8 and the establishment of the G-20 as the major forum for geopolitical and geo-economic discussions; (ii) the stalling of the Doha Round for World Trade, when in 2009 negotiations
