

author admits, "Parties engaged in violent conflicts cannot be expected to respond to a request to meet, even for academic purposes, unless not only what transpires but even the fact of meeting is secret. The secrecy aspect inhibits discussion among colleagues, injects into academic life an unwelcome element, and imposes some restraints upon publication of research papers" (232-33). Unfortunately, he then dismisses these objections all too easily: "However, this is no new experience; it is becoming more and more familiar as interaction between government and scholar develops. There are means of generalization after many separate analyses" (233).

The author apparently misses the crux of the objection to secrecy when he implies that because it is not new, its limitations have somehow been circumvented. The whole thrust of the behavioral movement, with which the author seems to identify so strongly, indeed the whole thrust of the social sciences in recent years, has been to make open to group scrutiny the substance of the data and the procedures of data analysis that form the basis of generalization. A scientist's work, his entire research cycle, must be subject to evaluation and replication if consensus on the findings is to be reached. Even speculative findings, which make up much of the theoretical observations in Professor Burton's work, suffer substantially when the conditions or events which stimulate the observations cannot be revealed. Perhaps fifty (?) years from now, when the data and detailed analyses are revealed, the work will be considered quite valuable. But, in the meantime, as Scott Greer argues in The Logic of Social Inquiry (Aldine, 1969), "outside the pressure cooker of policy-making, outside the nation state, is a larger scientific community which must be shown—not harangued" (8).

Despite these objections, the book is well worth reading. It reports on a new and potentially important technique of conflict control, a technique which the author convincingly argues deserves further study and experimental application. The limitations of controlled communication, as an analytical method for the study of world politics, should not detract from the book's original contribution to the literature on the role of third parties in the peaceful settlement of disputes.—DAVID W. MOORE, United States Military Academy.

Development Assistance in the Seventies: Alternatives for the United States. By ROBERT E. ASHER. (Washington: The Brookings Institution, 1970. Pp. 235. $6.95.)

The United States foreign assistance effort continues to be treated as an annual and emergency one. It is also a steadfastly American undertaking, largely planned and implemented by a national aid establishment under the close scrutiny of Congress. The program's primary mission has never been developmental; it has been more consistently designed and rationalized as a means of supporting the viability of friendly states against invasion and insurrectionary violence. If early post-war conditions made this type of approach at least understandable, present circumstances make it untenable. The current fundamental and world-wide revolutionary situation is as threatening to world order as it is unyielding to cold war diplomatic styles.

In a new work, Robert Asher, a well known student of development assistance, argues for an enhanced and restructured American aid effort, one which is conditioned by the responsibilities of affluence and the new parameters of the international system. Many of the proposals which he offers are quite familiar; some were being debated more than a decade ago. But combined they suggest a new and substantial departure from both the organization and the substance of previous endeavors, one which the author feels would serve to establish patterns of mutuality and self-help in the international development effort.

Asher sees as a primary need the reorganization of the U.S. development assistance enterprise—to give it a more multilateral and autonomous character. Multilateralization would be accomplished by a shift of the major portion of the nation's capital assistance program to international agencies and by systematic efforts to increase the reliance on recipient nations and international advisory groups for planning and review of the remaining bilateral undertakings. Even the responsibility for in-country programming and performance monitoring operations would increasingly devolve to multi-national agencies, with a subsequent reduction in the number of U.S. administrative personnel in the field. American technical specialists would begin to be hired directly by recipient nations with U.S. technical assistance agencies coming to serve primarily a brokerage function.

Related structural reforms would be directed at increasing the autonomy of American bilateral aid institutions. The fundamental modification would involve replacement of the Agency for International Development with three essentially independent agencies: a development cooperation bank, a technical cooperation foundation and a private investment corporation. The new agencies would have considerable discretion, receiving from Congress a general rather than a detailed mandate and necessary appropriations on a multiyear basis. They would also enjoy substantial flexibility in seeking additional sources of finance independent of the appropriations' process. Their operations would be kept distinct in every way possible from military assistance programming.
