

Five Components of an Information System

Hardware

The hardware aspect of an information system is the technology you can touch. These are the physical aspects of technology. Computers, tablets, mobile phones, disk drives, and more are all examples of information system hardware.

Software

Software builds directly upon the hardware of an information system. In fact, software is a set of instructions that tells hardware what to do. And unlike hardware, software is not tangible.

Data

You can think of data as a collection of facts and information. Like software, data is also intangible. By itself, data is not particularly useful. However, aggregated, indexed and organized data is a powerful tool for your organization.

People

From the front-line help desk workers all the way up to the Chief Information Officer (CIO), all people involved with the information system are an essential element that must not be overlooked because they make the technology useful in a practical sense.

Process

Information systems are becoming more and more integrated with the processes of an organization. This integration can bring more productivity and better control to those processes. However, simply automating activities using technology is not enough.
