

Contextual Family Therapy

Theoretical Assumptions

Contextual Family Therapy is an intergenerational therapy model that embraces at least three generations in the family session. Issues such as trustworthiness, loyalties, fairness and entitlement are emphasized during sessions. The key dynamic of all relationships is trustworthiness, which happens when everyone in the system has mutual consideration for each other, by considering the four dimensions of any family's reality.

Four Dimensions of Relational Reality

01

Factual

Facts about life and relationships that are difficult to change;
Age, Sex, parent's death in childhood, divorce, etc.

02

Individual Psychology

The way an individual processes information and translates into their emotions, feelings, motivations, and memories → sense of self → personality

03

Systemic Interactions

Communication and transactional patterns that dictate family rules, homeostasis, and appropriate roles

04

Relational Ethics

Balance of fairness; what you give and what you are entitled to receive; indebtedness; give and take when relating to each other
