Domestic Satellite: An FCC Giant Step Toward Competitive Telecommunications Policy

Robert S. Magnant

(Boulder, CO: Westview, 1977, 295 pp.)

James M. Janky, Reviewer

The essence of Mr. Magnant's work is that the decision by the FCC to introduce competition into the heretofore monopolistic telecommunications industry represents a profound change in government telecommunications policy and may be the most important single event in the history of the agency. The potential impact that a competitive telecommunications policy may have on society can only be guessed at. Opening up telecommunications to competition makes it possible to assimilate the explosive growth in capability occurring in this industry due to innovation at a much faster pace than what is ordinarily experienced with monopolies. Mr. Magnant gives enough background information on the subject in every relevant area to provide the reader with a real sense of understanding of both the processes in the changing regulatory environment and the technology. At the same time, it underscores the wisdom of the Domestic Satellite decision, thereby thoroughly complementing the FCC, an agency not generally noted for getting compliments, in a very convincing manner.

I found it interesting from a historical viewpoint, with a wealth of detailed background information on the subject of competition and monopoly in the telecommunications industry, the regulatory process, the advisory roles in the government and industry, and the future of data communications. I found it somewhat out of date in the specific areas of implementation, and the problems that SBS faces, but since it was not intended to look at technology per se, that is not so important. The book has a great deal of well-documented references and abounds with quotations from the people most closely involved in the decision-making process.

I think it is a valuable contribution to the literature in a subject area which has largely been the domain of the legal profession. It is very useful to anyone working in the regulatory area.

James M. Janky was born in Ann Arbor, MI, on September 15, 1942. He received the M.S. and Ph.D. degrees in electrical engineering from Stanford University, Stanford, CA, in 1966 and 1971.

At Stanford, he developed a prototype of a mass producible microwave receiver for use in broadcasting satellite applications. From 1972 to 1975, he participated in the Health-Education Demonstration with the ATS-6 satellite. He is Vice-President and Director of Engineering at EDUTEL Communications and Development, Inc., Palo Alto, CA. He has participated extensively in the design and implementation of National Public Radio's satellite interconnection system and he is a member of the U.S. Study Group 10/118 on Broadcasting Satellites.

Digital Processing of Speech Signals

L. R. Rabiner and R. W. Schafer

(Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1978, 512 pp.)

David Y. Wong, Reviewer

Speech research entered a new era with the introduction of digital processing techniques. We have witnessed a fast growing interest in the engineering and computer science community in this field of research, resulting in rapid progress in several areas. The book Digital Processing of Speech Signals written by two of the principals of this new area, is a timely volume on the subject. It will serve well as a textbook and as a reference for engineers and computer scientists. This reviewer has recently found the book extremely useful in teaching a graduate course on digital speech processing at the University of California, Santa Barbara. Many of the comments to follow are based on the reviewer's as well as on his students' experience.

The authors stated that they have chosen "to organize this book around several basic approaches to digital representations of speech signals." Given that there are an infinite number of ways to represent the speech signal, the techniques that have been useful, and they are the ones covered by the authors, are those that extract
