Factors Affecting the Process of Clinical Decision-making in Pediatric Pain Management by Emergency Department Nurses Teresa A. Russo, 2010 ABSTRACT The purpose of this mixed methods study was to describe the cognitive processes knowledge sources used by Emergency Department ED nurses in decision making activities regarding triage and pediatric pain assessment and management Deficiencies persist in ED pediatric pain assessment and management methods or approaches that might help resolve these deficiencies have not been identified previously Methodology triangulation with sequential use of qualitative quantitative methods provided a rich description of knowledge sources and cognitive processes used by ED nurses relative to pediatric pain assessment decisions Based on qualitative results a set of vignettes was developed to assess ED nurses Data analysis using ordinal logistic regression with a cumulative logit model identified patient and nurse variables which influence triage acuity decisions Five common themes emerged from the qualitative data 1 Age of the child is important 2 Behavior can tell a lot 3 Really looking at the patient 4 Things that help make decisions and 5 Things that hinder decisions Ordinal logistic regression analysis of the quantitative data identified predictor variables of infants compared to school age children Hispanic ethnicity moderate number of years of ED experience 11 20 years and years of education that were associated with higher triage levels The implications of this new knowledge include changes in ED triage nurse practice towards pain assessment and increased awareness of the need for education in use of pain assessment tools

Additional implications include education related to pain management practices by ED physicians and pain medication protocols at triage. This information may enhance triage and care of the pediatric patient experiencing pain, expand the knowledge base of emergency nursing, identify areas in which to implement changes, assist in improving care provided to children experiencing pain, and provide direction for future education, training, and research.

WHOSE DECISION IS THE BEST DECISION? CLINICAL DECISION-MAKING REGARDING THE MANAGEMENT OF PAIN: DIFFERENCES BETWEEN NOVICE, INTERMEDIATE AND EXPERT NURSES Yulia Gendler, 2017. Background and aims: Pain management is closely related to the decision-making process, which includes assessment and intervention. It is generally assumed that education and practical experience increase accuracy in decision-making. Benner's theory explains acquisition and development of skills from novice to expert but doesn't examine decision-making strategies. The purposes of the study: 1. Research of cognitive processes used by nurses during pain management decisions and the factors which may influence on these processes. 2. Examination of differences in pain management decision-making between novice, intermediate, and expert nurses. Methods: The subjects constitute a non-random sample of 65 registered nurses working in surgical wards in two Israeli medical centers. The study is based on vignettes describing common situations which require nurses' decision-making. Questionnaire examining decisions on a basis and script concordance test evaluating nurses' decision-making. The tools were designed by the researcher and validated by expert judgment. Results: The decision regarding pain management of expert nurses were mostly based on their experience and intuition, while novices and intermediates relied on guidelines or colleagues' advice. Master degree and participation in pain management educational programs were the factors with significant influence on nurses' decision making No association was found between seniority in a surgical ward and accuracy in decision making The findings were consistent with vignettes and script concordance test Conclusions Well developed guidelines may assist to novice nurses to improve decision making The script concordance test seems to be an effective tool in evaluating nurses' clinical decisions This study emphasized the benefit of nurses' higher education and participation in clinical educational programs
