Dynamic Labor Demand with Lumpy and Kinked Adjustment Costs Paola Rota, 2001 We analyze the dynamics of firms employment decisions which underlie lumpy and kinked adjustment costs We consider a dynamic structural model in which in each period firms face a choice of whether to vary the labor input or to postpone the adjustment to the future By exploiting the first order condition for optimality we derive a semi reduced form in which firms intertemporal employment are defined by a standard static marginal productivity condition augmented by a forward looking term In this way we obtain a marginal productivity equilibrium relation which takes into account the future alternatives of adjustment or non adjustment that firms face as the result of the presence of fixed and linear adjustment costs Linear costs amount to 35% of average labor costs and fixed costs are estimated to be about 3.65 times average unit labor costs Economics George Leland Bach, 1971 USA Textbook on economics covers economic analysis economic policies etc Illustrations references and statistical tables
