

the Arab League in 1945, the London Conference of 1946–47, or the establishment of the All Palestine Government in 1948. Each of these is an important element of Palestinian Arab history which a complete biography of the mufti should have addressed fully.

That Hajj Amin was a staunch anti-Zionist and vigorous Palestinian Arab nationalist is without question. But Mattar's mufti seeks to leave the impression that Hajj Amin was a temperate man, who did not resort to violence either against the Zionists or against other Palestinians. Mattar gives us only small shreds of selective evidence to support his case. With regard to the mufti's relationship to the August 1929 outbreak of Arab violence against Jewish immigration and land settlement, Mattar claims that "he [the mufti] neither incited nor planned the August 1929 violence" (p. 49), quoting as his source the majority findings of the Shaw Commissioners who looked into the causes of the disturbances. But Mattar gives an incomplete account, omitting the minority and opposite opinion given by M. P. Lord Snell. While not stating that the mufti was directly responsible for the August 1929 violence, Snell in his minority report claimed that the mufti "realized the danger of the disturbance," and therefore Snell faulted him for "failure to make any effort to control the character of an agitation conducted in the name of religion" (Great Britain, Report of the Commission on the Palestine Disturbances of August, 1929, 1930, Cmd. 3530, p. 172). The 1937 Royal Commission [Peel] Report was more assertive in identifying the mufti's direct involvement in instigating Palestine's disturbances (pp. 180–81). It is unclear whether Mattar had access to Isa Khalaf's balanced Oxford dissertation. In his 1986 thesis, "Arab Factionalist Politics and Social Differentiation in Palestine in the Last Decade of the Mandate," Khalaf argues that the mufti, at least in the 1940s, "not only resorted to intimidation of opponents, but also to murder and assassination" (p. 288) and that "his dictatorial methods and favoritism proved to be one more obstacle to Palestine Arab political unity" (p. 311).

The above comments notwithstanding, Mattar's book is suitable as a comparison with other biographies of the mufti. It should be read alongside Khadduri's short synopsis of the mufti in Arab Contemporaries (pp. 67–87) and with Yehoshua Porath's fine rendition in Asian and African Studies (1971) of how Hajj Amin consolidated his position as the mufti and interlaced his status of president of the SMC with the evolving Palestinian-Arab national movement. Although Zvi el-Peleg has recently written a useful biography of the mufti in Hebrew, an authoritative biography of the mufti in English remains to be published.

FATIMA MERNISSI, Doing Daily Battle: Interviews with Moroccan Women, Trans. Mary Jo Lakeland (New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1989). Pp. 224.

The life history (biography and autobiography) of ordinary people as a form of literature is almost as old as language, but only recently has it gained some credibility as a source for historical documentation and cultural insight, largely as the result of the work of the Annales school of history in France, pioneered by Marc Bloch and Lucien Lefevre. It was Bloch and Lefevre, and their students, who pointed out that the events of everyday life, the actions of ordinary people, constituted data, and, like the deeds of knights and the fiats of emperors, were part of the steadily flowing stream that they saw as history.

In Middle Eastern studies, the life history has recently blossomed and proliferated in a number of ways. John Waterbury's North For the Trade (1972) was an early example, in which, through depicting the events in the life of a Soussi merchant, the processes of migra-
