Cable Logging Systems Donald D. Studier, Virgil W. Binkley, 1976 Cable Logging Systems Roy S. Larsen, Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, 1981 CABLE LOGGING SYSTEMS. DONALD D. STUDIER, 1991 Cable Logging Systems Donald D. Studier, Virgil W. Binkley, 1978 Compendium of Major Cable Logging Systems Roy S. Larsen, 1978 Cable Logging Systems, 1981 Some environmental effects of cable logging in Appalachian forests James H. Patric, 1980 Power Requirements of Three Cable Logging Systems R. H. Perkins, 1980 Analysis of Intermediate Support Cable Logging Systems James W. Charland, 1997

The forest products industry often uses intermediate support cable logging systems to transport logs from the harvest site to a staging area. A method is presented to assist in the analysis and design of these cable systems. The method determines tensions in individual cables, forces on and stresses in the support trees, and the geometry of the system under load. Static equilibrium and cable length compatibility are used to generate a system of simultaneous equations. This system of coupled non-linear algebraic equations is solved numerically using the Newton-Raphson algorithm. A good automated initial guess for the unknown quantities based on the physics of the problem is provided. A model of an example intermediate support cable logging system is analyzed by the proposed approach and the resulting behavior is discussed. The method includes the effects of catenary sag and elastic stretch in the cables and elastic behavior in the support trees. Friction is ignored in the formulation. The catenary and elastic stretch methodologies for the cables are each demonstrated on a single cable span as well as on a demonstration cable system. The effect of the support tree flexibility and cable mass are found to be significant on the response of the cable logging system. The effects of elastic stretch in the cables is not found to be significant for the cable logging systems considered.

Cable Logging Systems (Italia). FAO (Roma, 1981). Forests which have a great potential source of income in developing countries can and often do provide badly needed employment opportunities for rural people. In the recent past and even today tractor skidding was the logging technique mostly used in tropical mechanized logging. However, as forest development moves up to hinterland where the terrain is often too steep for tractor skidding, cable logging is often more advantageous, not for productivity but also often for soil conservation. The effects of any logging system on the residual stand can have a bearing on which of any system to use. Cable logging was primarily developed in central Europe and introduced into and redeveloped in North Europe, North America, and Japan according to their own forest conditions. This manual is designed to give the reader an overall picture of the different major cable logging systems being manufactured at this time and how these systems compare with each other. The most important aspect in trying to achieve this goal has been to describe all systems in a similar manner in order that the reader can directly compare the systems and determine which systems are appropriate for a given set of conditions.

Predicting the Payload Capability of Cable Logging Systems Including the Effect of Partial Suspension Gary D. Falk, 1981 An Analysis of Road Changing on Several Cable Logging Operations Denis James Van Winkle, 1977. Road changing is the activity of moving operating lines on a cable yarding operation to permit access to logs in an unyarded portion of a logging unit. The time required to perform this activity varies widely and may consume a significant portion of the total yarding time. With rising costs in the logging industry, the efficiency of cable logging systems is constantly under critical review. Additional research in the area of road changing has been suggested in several studies. Dykstra 1974 and Peters 1973. Road changing information was gathered on several yarding operations in conjunction with detailed production studies of cable logging systems. On six of the operations, the total time consumed by road changing was noted and recorded as a delay in the yarding process. On four operations, road changing was segmented into various activities and factors hypothesized to influence road changing time were identified and measured. On the four operations studied in detail, two crewmen timed the road changing operation as the activities involved occurred at widely separated locations on the logging unit. The continuous time study method used on the overall production study Dykstra 1975a was also used during road changing. The analysis of road changing involves a descriptive analysis of all the operations studied and a quantitative analysis of road changing on the four operations studied in detail. The descriptive analysis consists primarily of a comparative investigation of road changing time between the operations. The quantitative analysis consists of a regression analysis of the four operations examined in detail. In the comparison of road changing times for the ten operations observed, road changing time varied widely. Even among similar systems, a wide range was observed. This variability was most likely due to the differences in the road changing methods themselves, varying characteristics of the logging units, and lengthy delays encountered during road changing. This could not be confirmed for six of the operations as road changing was not recorded in detail. However, among those operations observed in detail, this influence could be seen. Following a breakdown of road changing into machine intensive activities, labor intensive activities, and delays, a large percentage of road changing time is occupied by delays. Also, the greatest proportion of delay-free time involved labor intensive activities. This was expected on the operations where pre-layout of roads was not done. On the operation where roads were pre-laid, other activities requiring labor intensive action occurred. Some of the delays encountered may have been due to characteristics of the particular yarder being used. A quantitative analysis was made of four operations. Road changing time, excluding delays, and the time required to relocate the yarder was used as the dependent variable. Delay-free road changing time was found to be a function of the distance from the landing to the tailhold, SPAN, and ground slope. For two of the operations, identical machines and methods were used. A combined regression equation was formed based on the independent variable SPAN. Also, based on the scatter of observations for these systems, an equation using SPAN² as the independent variable was found to be a better predictor of delay-free road changing time than SPAN.

Logging System Analysis Package for Micro-computers Joosang Chung, 1987 A computer program package to estimate cable yarding payload capability was made. The package was intended to expand applicability of existing packages and to be user friendly. It has six system options: live skyline, standing skyline, running skyline, slackline, multispans, and highlead. In the standing skyline and multispans analyses, load path analysis as well as payload analysis is available as an optional basis. Each program for the analysis of a system was built to include subroutines to consider its mechanical characteristics which are usually ignored in existing packages. The running skyline program has an option to consider the maximum torque on the haulback drum. The highlead analysis program has an option to consider the effect of cable drag. The multispans has a subroutine to check carriage passage over a support jack and an option to consider the effect of jack friction. In addition, the effect of log drag and log shape as well as choking strategy can be considered as an optional basis. The paper was written to present the mathematical formulations and modeling procedures used in building the package. In addition, outputs of an example run for each system are presented with interpretations.

Decoding Cable Logging Systems: Revealing the Captivating Potential of Verbal Expression

In an era characterized by interconnectedness and an insatiable thirst for knowledge, the captivating potential of verbal expression has emerged as a formidable force. Its capability to evoke sentiments, stimulate introspection, and incite profound transformations is genuinely awe-inspiring. Within the pages of "Cable Logging Systems," a mesmerizing literary creation penned by way of a celebrated wordsmith, readers embark on an enlightening odyssey, unraveling the intricate significance of language and its enduring effect on our lives. In this appraisal, we shall explore the book's central themes, evaluate its distinctive writing style, and gauge its pervasive influence on the hearts and minds of its readership.
