

Clinical Decision-making Processes in Perioperative Nursing

Although perioperative nurses are required by the nature of the environment to arrive at clinical decisions quickly, the processes by which these clinical decisions are made is not fully understood. Perioperative practice models are not well documented, and the essence of perioperative nursing is not well identified. As a result, the ways in which perioperative nurses influence patient care delivery and patient outcomes is not known.

PURPOSE

The purpose of this qualitative study was to reveal the processes used by expert perioperative nurses as they make clinical decisions. As the processes of expert clinical decision making are more fully understood, this knowledge can be used to assist the novice perioperative nurse in the quest towards excellence. The goal of this research was to answer the following question: What are the processes used by expert perioperative nurses in clinical decision making?

REVIEW OF LITERATURE

Several research studies have been conducted regarding clinical decision making of critical care nurses.¹ These scholars have interviewed a total of more than 350 nurses and noted a relationship between expert decision making and intuitive knowledge. More and more nursing literature supports the idea of intuitive knowledge as a valid way of knowing and one that nurses use to arrive at clinical decisions in variety of settings.² In addition, several studies have found a caring relationship associated with intuitive recognition and intervention.³

Very little research has been conducted about the ways in which perioperative nurses make clinical decisions.⁴ No studies were found that linked perioperative nursing practice to patient outcomes, yet few of us would question the contributions that expert perioperative nurses make to positive patient outcomes. As perioperative nursing practice is not well documented, administrators who are unfamiliar with how perioperative nurses contribute to quality care suggest that unlicensed assistive personnel (UAP) may be substituted for nurses to save money. This research project provides an initial step in understanding the decision-making processes of perioperative nurses and, thus, their contributions to patient care.

ASSUMPTIONS

Assumptions explicit in this research are that the perioperative nurse is a necessary, vital member of the surgical team who contributes to the achievement of positive patient outcomes. The perioperative nurse must possess the ability to make clinical decisions quickly and accurately so that quality patient care occurs in the OR. Some situations require decisions critical for the preservation of life. More often, however, situations require everyday decisions

ABSTRACT

The purpose of this phenomenological study was to reveal the processes of clinical decision making by expert perioperative nurses. Six nurses with a minimum of five years experience who considered themselves to be experts in OR nursing were asked to describe perioperative situations in which they had made a difference in patient outcomes. In every situation described, an intricate pattern of concern was present and associated with further assessments. The pattern was labeled Seeing the big picture: Engendered through caring. This study provides initial documentation to support how RNs make critical contributions to the quality of perioperative patient care. AORN J 70 (July 1999) 45-62.
