Decommissioned Submarines In The Russian Northwest Assessing And Eliminating Risks:

Decommissioned Submarines in the Russian Northwest E.J. Kirk, 2012-12-06 Until the late 1970s most commercial power plant operators outside the United States adopted a spent fuel management policy of immediate reprocessing and recycling of recovered products In response to rising reprocessing prices decreasing values of recovered products concerns over proliferation risks and a belief in the favorable economics of direct disposal many utilities have since opted to store spent fuel on an interim basis pending the availability of direct disposal facilities or a change in the economic and or political climate for reprocessing and recycling uranium and plutonium Spent fuel has traditionally been stored in water filled pools located in the reactor building or fuel handling buildings on reactor sites or as part of large centralized facilities e.g. Sellafield La Hague CLAB Because the economics of pool storage are dependent on the size of the facility the construction of additional separate pools on reactor sites has only been pursued in a few countries such as Finland and Bulgaria

Decommissioned Submarines in the Russian Northwest Elizabeth J. Kirk, 1997 Contains papers from a June 1996 NATO Advanced Research Workshop on Recycling Remediation and Restoration Strategies for Contaminated Civilian and Military Sites in the Arctic Far North held in Kirkenes Norway Papers are organized in sections on spent nuclear fuel low and intermediate level liquid and solid wastes and risk assessment and monitoring techniques An introductory section overviews current radioactive contamination issues in the Arctic North operation and infrastructure of the Russian nuclear fleet and plans and problems in worldwide decommissioning of nuclear submarines A conclusion discusses integration of technical projects with larger political and economic contexts Annotation copyrighted by Book News Inc Portland OR
