

Translation and Transposition

I suppose that the broadest distinction ever drawn between ways of transferring literary material from one language to another in the distinction between translations and poésies. And the broadest account of that distinction is that where a critic proposes to take care of the letter of the original, a translation must attend to the spirit. But that is broad indeed, as John Leishman of a distinction, and for the purposes of this paper I intend to insert a subtle wedge between translations and poésies. The term I propose is "transposition". Transposition, in the sense I choose to give it, means when the language of the source is so translated as to make close enough to the language of the translator — in age, idiom, cultural habit and so on — for him to be able to follow the letter with a fair hope of keeping faith with the spirit. Translating a modern French novel from English is thus mainly a matter of transposition. Poetry is more difficult, because its verbal organization is usually more concentrated and more personal; nevertheless a good deal of modern verse can usually be transposed. Take the English version of the poems of Claudel by Professor Macneil: it is, in a perfectly honestable sense, essentially a first reading; yet as an account of the source (and more) of Claudel it is very serviceable and will stand much more as account is needed — and of course permitted by the laws of copyright — to attempt a poetic recreation; yet, in other words, a translation. A somewhat more ambitious example of transposition is the version of Rilke's Deine Klänge by Leishman and Spivack. It reads like poetry, and as such, it seems to reproduce something of the spirit of Rilke's poems, and yet it is close enough to the letter of the original to help the reader who needs to see Claudel to recognize Rilke's German words.

The further one moves back in time, the more transposition must approximate to translation. There is nevertheless a definite element of what I am calling transposition even in the loose modern rendering of a poem relatively as distant as the Divine Comedy. In the sense that Lawrence Binyon would call a modern English equivalent for Dante's medieval Italian, this is true translation. But since Dante's language and the particular of his poetry are still just within halting distances, Binyon was able to transpose. He could for example take over Dante's term rima more or less unchanged, though as a loose reader, the reader who helps to give Dante's line its peculiar concentration; he was able to follow the context of the spirit and even the particular of the movement. Let me quote a single stanza:
