ABSTRACT

Noting that most educators would agree that whole language no longer looks the same, this book collects eight articles written by whole language advocates and practitioners from New Zealand, Australia, and the United States that focus on the changes, growth, and development that have occurred in whole language both in philosophy and practice. They emphasize that whole language continues to have an important place in the literacy education of children. After an introduction by the editors, articles in the book are: "Whole Language: Are We Critical Enough?" (Beth Berghoff, Jerry Harste, and Chris Leland); "This Is Literacy: Three Challenges for Teachers of Reading and Writing" (David Bloome); "Defining Whole Language in a Postmodern Age" (Lorraine Wilson); "Towards a Personal Theory of Whole Language: A Teacher-Researcher Writer Reflects" (Don Fox); "Teaching Factual Writing: Purpose and Structure" (David Wray and Maureen Lewis); "They Don't Teach Spelling Anymore--or Do They?" (Christine Bouffler); "Really? Writing in School: Generic Practice?" (Jo-Anne Reid); and "Whole Language and Its Critics: A New Zealand Perspective" (John Smith). (RS)

The Changing Face of Whole Language Jan Turbill,1997 Resources in Education ,2000 The Changing Face of Whole Language ,1998 There are some who will argue that whole language was a fad of the 1980s The articles in this volume form a response to this claim They demonstrate that whole language is alive and healthy albeit a little worse for wear from the effects of uninformed and often deliberately malicious naming or labelling and a lack of understanding of the changes and change processes that whole language philosophy and its related pedagogy have experienced over the years
