Live from Capitol Hill! Stephen Hess, 1991 In this fourth volume of his highly acclaimed Newswork series Stephen Hess offers a revealing look at the culture of journalism in Washington and the relations between legislators and the media Satellite technology cable television and gavel to gavel coverage of floor proceedings in the House and Senate during the 1980s led many to believe that local media were challenging the importance of big circulation newspapers and network television news As headlines proclaimed that hometown coverage was booming observers envisioned new sources of information for viewers and voters But journalists and scholars questioned whether increased local coverage would further ensure the reelection of incumbents whether senators and representatives would become media show horses and whether the commitment to representing the people would be compromised In Live from Capitol Hill Hess challenges conventional wisdom about media Congress relations by vividly exploring how Congress affects local news media and how the media influence Congress He assesses how much gets reported by the Washington regional news bureaus and how little actually appears on television screens across the country and discusses which members of Congress receive coverage and in what context On the other side he shows how legislators try to influence new coverage through press releases video tapes columns in local newspapers and op ed articles      ASNE American Society of Newspaper Editors,1989      The Global Journalist David Hugh Weaver,Wei Wu,1998 This volume includes reports of systematic surveys of journalists in 21 countries It takes a global perspective on the demographics education socialization professionalization and working conditions of journalists in these countries      Consumer Sourcebook ,1998      Editor & Publisher ,1917      The Nigerian Economist ,1999      Perspectives on American Book History Scott E.
