

Opportunities for collaboration between African partners and SPRU

Joint Research Chains and Research Partnerships

It emerged that there is appetite, particularly from South Africa, Nigeria, and Kenya, in setting up a Joint Research Chair (JRC) in each of these countries. The JRC, to focus on Innovation Policy for Transformative Change, will facilitate research partnerships and projects, collaboratively designed from the ground up. There will be space for flexibility in how the JRC programme is implemented, ensuring that it is context-based and country-specific.

Capacity Building, Training and Mentoring for Innovation and Transformative Change

Capacity-building will be at the individual and organisational level. A diverse range of stakeholder groups was identified. This includes members of the informal sector as they have specific knowledge to contribute. Knowledge sharing amongst these different groups was deemed to be critical.

Recommendations for possible areas of research and collaboration include mapping the current capabilities and initiatives in Africa; supporting capacity-building initiatives driven by Africans; and assisting in the development of monitoring and evaluation tools. SPRU is also considering establishing PhD scholarships, which would focus on certain topics related to Innovation Policy for Transformative Change that are of strategic importance to particular African countries. Dedicated and sustainable funding is required for training. This needs to be further explored in collaboration with industry, academia, government and international development partners. There is also a need for targeted training in various aspects of STI policymaking, such as formulation, implementation, reviews, and measurement and evaluation of policy outcomes. Some of the key issues include challenges in identifying people to be trained, and designing and implementing training programmes to ensure efficiency and sustainability. SPRU could collaborate with African universities to design training programmes, and with national government agencies to conduct needs assessments.

Developing STI Indicators and measuring innovation

In order to sufficiently capture innovation activities in Africa, there is a need for new and/or alternative indicators (NAIs). Such NAIs would be expected to be more wide-ranging, to capture innovation activities from the informal sector, and to measure innovation activities that are of interest and relevance to individual localities, nations or regions. They would be able to capture 'high-tech' as well as 'low-tech' STI, formal and informal (indigenous) knowledge sources, and be open to continuous improvement, within an agreed framework. Effective measurement of innovation activities (that, for example, goes beyond simple ex-post indicators and monitoring to ex-ante and real-time approaches; and that shifts from input and output indicators to more focus on outcome indicators) is essential to policy-relevant research, good governance of STI, and evidence-based policymaking. SPRU has an active research programme focusing on indicators and measurements of STI, and welcomes opportunities to work with colleagues in Africa in this regard.

Energy Security, Low Carbon Development and Transformative Change

The Energy Trilemma, with its three dimensions of energy security, energy equity and environmental sustainability, is relevant here. However, the SPRU-Africa engagement findings revealed that at the local level the poor do not necessarily respond to the trilemma issues - often they are more concerned with access and affordability. There remain considerable disparities regarding grid connection across countries in Africa. It was agreed that solutions for those who are off-grid should also take into consideration aspirations for grid access. For solutions to be effective and sustainable it is imperative that off-grid technologies are reliable, of good quality and affordable.
